Bodies We've Buried is a fascinating inside look at the ten-week program that is offered three times a year. It helps if readers are familiar with the CSI television franchise, but most references to the show can be understood from context. The chapters take readers through the course segments in sequence, from crime scene management and basic techniques, through research at the Body Farm, to bloodstain pattern analysis, arson, bombs, and trace evidence.

One was wrapped in a tarp, a common way for criminals to hide bodies. The team selected pigs that had been dead for as little as a week to as long as two months to show the varying degrees of insect development. The team used only pigs that had died of natural causes or had a fatal condition and had to destroyed, Williams said.
