This brief yet gruesome battle demolished the soul-sunken Jacobite army and the many Scottish clans who fought for them. This sombre spot today has been reported as haunted by multiple sources, including Outlander author Diana Gabaldon, who was reduced to tears by the presence of the fallen when visiting the battle site. Some hear sword clashes and painful cries, while others set eyes on a Highland warrior or injured cadavers.

Edinburgh Castle is said to be one of the most haunted places in Scotland as it is connected to the Royal Mile by a network of tunnels. Many years ago a piper was sent to explore the tunnels and was told to keep playing so his progress could be tracked. However, halfway down the Royal Mile, the music suddenly stopped and the piper was never found.

Perhaps the most popular of Stirling's ghosts is the Green Lady. It's believed that she was a servant to Mary Queen of Scots. One night the Queen was asleep in her chamber when her bed curtains were set alight by a candle at her bedside. The servant saved her life, only she lost her own in the process.

Another ghost believed to wander Stirling is a woman called the Pink Lady. Tales of her are fewer than those of the Green Lady, thus any indication of who she was is even more difficult to know for certain. Yet one of the prevalent theories is that she is Mary, Queen of Scots herself, still haunting the rooms of her childhood and widow's shelter.
